[page 2 as printed in 1974]

Published by MAKAR PRESS, P.O. Box 71, St. Lucia, Q. 4067. The BLAST AREA was typeset on an IBM Composer at the University of Queensland in 12/13 Aldine Roman and printed by Watson Ferguson and Co.

General Editor: Martin Duwell

National Library of Australia card number and ISBN Q 909354 00 6

Cover Design: Spot Graphics
Copyright © John Tranter 1974
CONTENTS

3 Contents
6 Negatives
7 On the Beach
8 Mark
9 The Guadalcanal Motel
10 Guernica
11 The Country of Love
12 Poem Ending with a Line by Rimbaud
13 The Disadvantage of the Diesel Engine
14 The Rise and Fall of the Third Reich
15 Cheap Thrills
16 What Camus Said
17 Love Story
18 The Big Porsche
19 The Territory of Darkness
20 The Dubious Synthesis
21 Compromise
22 Making It
23 Money is a Kind of Poetry
24 The Question of Values
25 The Last Run
26 The Distillation of a Style
27 The Summing-Up
28 The Poem in Love
29 The Poem in Love: 1
37 [ Inside back cover ]
This book is dedicated with respect and affection to the memory of John Darcy.

_Sovereign Lords of Death, I’ve neither cursed nor praised you. Pity me, a traveller who’s made so many of these journeys without luggage, with no master, no money, with fame gone elsewhere; surely you’re mighty, surely you can take a joke, pity this madman who, even before he passes the barrier, even, now is shouting his name to you; catch him in mid-air, let him fit if he can to your customs and to your attitudes, and if it pleases you to help him, then I pray, help him._

— Henri Michaux
Negatives

Money is a kind of poetry.

— Wallace Stevens
ON THE BEACH

‘It’s not at all bad here,’ he said, ‘in the winter.’
Turning to the gramophone: ‘Play it again. Remember Stitching together an old gesture of Bogart’s.
‘Why, there’s the wine . . . enough to get drunk.
A trunk of white sand, bones, sea-wrack. We make do,
don’t we?’ Leaden sky, sea chewing at the shoal, wrecks glitter in the mist. A ceaseless distant rumble deadens the atmosphere. ‘What we don’t do, we make believe. Props, phoney reminiscences, skeleton deeds, isn’t that the game? Spinner?’ He’s had a bellyfull of sail.
The pictured spinnaker bellies from the wall,
hail lashes at the frozen wash.

That’s the story, I suppose, to fix a human action
in a chemical flux, or print a flush of dyes
in black and white. As bleached ribcage, matted feathers tangle in a foam slurry to an image like a clenched fist,
so the old salt weathers out a season in deceit.
He acted in front of the lidless lens
last Fourth of July, for the deaf Redskin. ‘No paint, you’d swear it was the real blood! Swear!
Right? Skinner?’ Right onto the reef in a foamburst and making up for the girls. The old goat.
Mark finished it himself, choosing midnight and a garbage-littered swamp. He scrawled a note and stuffed it in a pocket: ‘Like shooting a dog. The Vibrations. Someone please try to bring me back.’ They pulled him from the mud and dressed him up and put him underground again. A week before that he’d grabbed me in the street, shaking, speaking in a foreign tongue. Lost for seven years. ‘It’s all right, I’ll move along,’ he said. Cosmic radiation fried his brain. He had tapped a private source of horror cliches; nightmare rushed out, and the gestures that he used in self-defence were worn threadbare with too much fingering. He wove a plot to save the masses; loners, misbegotten, drifting on the edges of Night City. All he needed was ‘charisma’. One day he left a note: ‘The Princess: She must be saved, even at the cost of death, her own death, if need be. I’m sorry that I cut the Cross against the grain, damaging the door. Yours. Mark.’ Vibrations called him from a network on the other side of town. He had scuttled off by the time the medics came to strap him down.

Once, years ago, when he was ‘elegant’, he brought us wine; we ate well, and drank by candlelight. It seemed that sanity was easily bought; one needed only to be young. Methedrine, in moderation, kept him on the track. ‘I’m not interested,’ the doctor said, ‘in arty reminiscences. Find the stupid prick and bring him back.’
THE GUADALCANAL MOTEL

They hold no holidays at the Guadalcanal Motel; the Sergeant stumps about the dusty yard trying out his new leg and the President weeps in his spider-web study, while the peons run chattering off the rocks and drown themselves in the grey Pacific. They make no mourning, keeping part of their trivial sorrow in reserve for the day when it will be needed again, for the night when the blue troops splash ashore and rake the sandhills into patchwork rat shit, bringing the Guadalcanal Motel into the arms of the New Republic amid a litter of spent shells. They haunt the American conscience like a rotten nightmare in a flicker of old movie clips: ‘Platoon Five! Take the hill!’ And the ambulance drivers weep and slash the air with glass slivers from a shattered windscreen. They take no leave, beating the stubborn earth with blunt clubs in a travesty of agriculture, and ripping up whatever foliage they might encounter, which is not much, green being a surreal and worthless luxury in the Motel trenches. Each morning they salute the statues of the ancient king who sold them into slavery and the franchise king who brought them money, poverty and Coca Cola.
GUERNICA

There’s no use questioning the wretch
with his face in tatters and the bandolier holding his guts together. You’d be better stretching on the cobblestones beneath a tank
to get a view: that tank across the village square aiming its throat at the running grenadier
and the hog-leg pistol in his belt.
Take the Stuka staking out the air
with banshee breath; the bombing pilot
has a dark complexion, and his thumb on the button is very easily dealing death. There is no postcard view of the town, in this ruin,
though russet palms flock to the ‘Med’
as they have done before, and delighted many.
Take the army, in its various wreck,
and the rising tide of dead, who cry to us
through the watery lens: Huh! You!
Tomorrow we are mutton! Any nightmare is equal when the dream chokes to an end!
If you like the beach you'll find the water blue.
The blasting Oerlikon executes a rhyme
and strips the pilot from his sight.

There’s no use cornering the gunner in his grief.
His fingers rest along the rim of night.
THE COUNTRY OF LOVE

There are great fingers of ice that turn to rain
then to acrid tears, there is a house
for the blind, and in the house, a morbid Supervisor
seeing everything, who in his uniform
stares each day at the old blind men, there are plants that reach down to the ground and grip! The sun in his daily penitential journey strikes the old stumbling men, warming some, but killing many! The tears are not dried up, the ice remains a tumbled glacier, tussocks start up from the field as if cloths were horror-struck and hair stood on end,
grass reaching up for air above the thicket,
and there is no stone (this is the country of Love)
but brambles pluck their vengeance on the Traveller whose tears are never dry, being constantly replenished
from his horrid grief, the worse for being foolish and without substance! For She is still in love

though in another country where the shafts of ice drift to gentle snow, and fashionable couples glide by on skis, and all the light permitted
is a kindly glow, and all these things are visible!
And hurtful to the sight the old blind men flounder
in the white which darkens to a muted blue
then to purple glowing in the champagne dusk!
POEM ENDING WITH A LINE BY RIMBAUD

He: It is easier to like the soldier
when he laughs and shoots a foaming dog rather than a man, or child, and easier then to hold the hand grenade. No plane comes down faster when the jets are shot
than the law of gravity allows. Let the radar plot, let the men drink poisoned lemonade.
It is better to allow the tide
to bring the fish in as they will,
or in that shoal as that shoal moves
like a flock of leaves across the hill,
across the traffic and the school of windscreens damp with love. Leave the office, leash the dog that nibbles at his bone,
bring all your country longings to an end.
Prepare your face to be an imprint of the scene
the clock, the limping man, the cash machine.
Wax the ski. Compress the snow.

She: Et mon bureau?
On or about the time of the death of your friend, did you make certain inflammatory remarks to the effect that the promulgation of a state of bliss (Ananda) was both the responsibility of the State and the inalienable right of the Working Class?
— No.
Did you attempt to convince certain members of the USAID mission at Loc Nol that this state of bliss (Ananda) could be likened metaphorically to that state of mechanical repose evidenced by the U-Boat of the Tiger’ class under the command of a distant relative of Field-Marshal Rommel at about 0530 hours on the 29th of April, 1943?
— Yes.
Was this state of knowledge-being-awareness (Sat-Chit-Ananda) reported missing in action during the closing phases of the Pacific war?
— Yes.

How did you describe the advantages of this gambit?
— The U-Boat was resting on the surface of the water.
What was the reason given for this action?
— Brahman was charging its batteries.
On or about the time of the funeral of your friend, did you make certain remarks referring to the hypothesised connection between the ‘desire’ of Brahman to perceive itself, and the projected re-emergence of the NSDAP?
— It’s possible. I think I was either ‘stoned’ or ‘being stoned’ at the time.
You were observed in conversation with a ‘young woman’. Is this ‘woman’ a ‘friend’?
— No.
Did you later describe this woman as a ‘good screw’?
— No. (Aircraft noise)

Do you wish to continue this conversation?
— Conversation?
Do you wish to avoid these questions which, spreading their roots, bring in the end only ivresse et folie?
— Ah-oo-gah! Ah-oo-gah!
Are you about to dive?
— Yes.
Is it true that I am mentally unstable?
CHEAP THRILLS

One error, in fact, of eccentricity in poetry is to seek for new human emotions to express; and in this search for novelty in the wrong place it discovers the perverse.

— T. S. Eliot
WHAT CAMUS SAID

Peta, flayed red on the harrowed sand.
Dune buggy aerials across the tattered sky.
‘I dropped surfing,’ she said, ‘you know,
too slow, all that bullshit mysticism.
Give me a good stretch of tar,
something to break the monotony.
What was it Camus said? He bought his in an auto wreck. He should know.
Want a steak?’ Nothing more personal
than the firm muscle, sheen of sweat;
she tricked you with a sly honesty.
‘I suppose you’d say it’s sexual,
I mean, that gearstick stuff.’

I watched her drop back into second just before the crest. She shot off the top of the sand ridge
and vanished: Camus, Frank O’Hara,
all the restless ghosts.
LOVE STORY

They had lunch by the lake
then they gathered up their movements and drove head first into the accident of the city.
Will you move into my apartment?
Will you climb out of bed at sunrise?
They drove put into the country of trees.
I would like the season to be grateful
in the way it has of being less than cruel.
Showers, easy traffic, make up the symphony
they wallow in, in the framework of personal past tense, now that we watch them
flashed and faded in the photograph.
We can move over the Alps!
They sat behind the window of the limousine
and watched the sun rise into the weather.

They drove head first
into the beautiful accident.
The Big Porsche

We watched Sebring on a crate of beer,
the sick men in the mad machinery.
Pushing two hundred past the flag.
‘Take that McQueen — can he drivel
And with a broken foot!’
She swung the spanner, clank!
clank! against the block. ‘No cracks
there, at any rate. See you at Monaco.’

She wrapped it up later, the big Porsche,
and they had to pull her out of the wreck.
Six months in hospital, and she said to me ‘Well, he came in second, but he was wheeling it on his own. Did you see the interview? He looked awful.
Christ it hurt.’
THE TERRITORY OF DARKNESS

Under the pressure of great acceleration the heavy cars left the grid. Hours later there were no vehicles to be seen.
We visited Italy on an impulse, she said. Two cars fled around the corner. One red, one green.
The sky was a terrible white.
They were ‘in pursuit of speed’.
We left the country late that evening under cover of high velocity, thunder from a twin exhaust and low cloud. There were flowers at the border for the drivers of the cars which had vanished into the territory of darkness. One of the borders turned red in the night.

The air was obsessive, the cars followed at incredible speed, into the darkness.
The next time we returned under cover of a dubious cargo, drifting through the mist at dawn, there were no drivers to be seen.
THE DUBIOUS SYNTHESIS

Peta made it easy for the boy: good food,
a dab of poetry, a lust for dictionaries.
She was amusing, all right, moving fast
to keep the mistakes under control.
‘How difficult,’ she complained to me once,
‘how tiresome to wear a whole society like a pack!
The weight! the stupidities! the greed!’
Nonetheless she made a job of it. She made it difficult for all of them: bad faith,
a stab at honesty, abusive literacy.
‘How simple it would be,’ she told me,
‘to shuck off the whole greedy pack. Friends, lovers. Chuck the lot of them!’

‘I keep making some synthesis,’ she said,
‘and it never works. Speed, power, greed.
Do you call this living?’
COMPROMISE

Certain vehicles are produced for luxury. The engineer removes his overcoat and steps into the spartan frame. Steel surrounds him, fittingly. He moves the vehicle at great speed along the motorway. The girl in the skimpy mink climbs into the leather seat and rushes about in a frenzy of comfort. She would like more speed! Other vehicles have the aim of brutal power. The staff of the engineer are all regretful, attempting to steer a middle course. They come together in a new design: staff, engineer, the girl who gets around. They move about the highways in a game of elegance dreaming of metal, markets, power, contradictions.

The people of the countryside also move about, strapped to the spartan frame of compromise.
MAKING IT

He idles home along the waterfront at dawn, the motor ticking over. The sun is an orange blob on a lake of blue paint, he thinks. He is not often wrong. Peta languishes in her apartment as well as she can, which is easily though lacking style. The sun gives a bright shudder across the mirror in the marble room. It is all because of the money! she imagines. She is wrong. He is a big hairy bastard! The money! He has another girl in Switzerland, another car, another bank account. The red Daytona ticks along as best it can, which is very well indeed. He thinks: She is wham! Big tits! He is an American. She thinks: wham! big tits! so what, desiring the pretty chambermaid. She is sometimes so inclined: wham! motor car! chambermaid! The sun does its best to rise over the Mediterranean and make a big blue day. They love, as best they can, which is very clumsily, but well.
MONEY IS A KIND OF POETRY

Consider the images which orbit
around the red Ferrari: style, expertise, aggression. Consider the manipulation of the symbols which surround the red Ferrari,
consider the bull in the ring, how the colours
bring him to madness, if it is possible
the machine will excite certain glands,
if it can be done the car will break up under the strain. There is much to be considered:
engineering subtlety, brutality, immense advertising. Consider the money that whirls in a heated constellation

in the vast brain of the red Ferrari.
It was too late to leave for France, with the snow embroidering the brown sky. There was a rime of dirty ice along the edges of the gravel, and sour green
where rotting leaves splashed the lawn.
‘So we stayed with the Countess,’ said Peta, ‘though we knew she wasn’t real.’ Two lightning flashes laced
the uniform she wore. It was predictable:
history repeating itself across the lake, justice
perverted to a cruel luxury. The dark came early, moved down from the alps in a silent avalanche
and filled the grounds. So they lived, for an afternoon, in an ‘atmosphere of monstrous corruption’.
She would talk about it later as a watershed,
a time of sickness when the will became infected
and led the spirit to stumble through the future
with a repetitive spasm. ‘You know I look sane,’
she said, ‘and beautiful; but by God
you don’t know the half of what I lost.
When things are possible, their value, good or bad,
can come to less than nothing. Is that right?’

It was too late to leave for Paris. Vast hail slaked the damp grey countryside. ‘We were very young,’ said Peta. ‘It would seem.’
THE LAST RUN

Coming over the pass in poor weather
Peta at the wheel — into a new countryside
and a different view of hard labour.
There was time enough to taste an apprenticeship
to cheap thrills, but a loose one in the group brought bad news — some train wreck,
a touchy omen of sex developed to hysteria.
We left the most expendable friendships at the station.
Disaster gambled for our favour, Doctor Threat made a subtle play for our regard. No chance, with such a tight judiciary, so we filled the tank and moved out.
The weather querulous, all the roads bad
and a troubled motor — these deterred, though soft hands were capable.
‘Did I tell you about Paolo? And the Dwarf Intelligence?’
Something to do with the police in another state,
another frame of mind. So we told stories, mostly true, about the taste of youth for foolishness
and high speed. Darkness moved on.

We were soon out of danger and through the pass —
the last run, she promised,
though we knew it wouldn’t keep.
Too much truth in sex, too much opportunity for soft developments. Looking back over the mountains where the frost
bit our shoes, she said ‘Damn it,
I liked the countryside,
and the people who escaped.’
THE DISTILLATION OF A STYLE

They were running well ahead of time
when a jagged flash cracked the perspex
and the road skidded out of sight.
A fighter plane drops over the rise and leaps forward for the sea. I am left to think on eagerness. They were willing to leave risk out of the reckoning so that a style
could be distilled: trim, essential, tight,
without encumbrances and no remorse,
lopping off a second from the reflex arc.
They broke through the forest and down the slope
with a burst of power. Some detail bent askew.
They tracked a red splash along a wall
and left a smudge of oilsmoke wiped across the sky
in a hasty scrawl, an empty valley,

and a fighter plane dwindling into the cloudbank
where the line of sea attempts a perfect emptiness.
THE SUMMING-UP

Some time later I visited the scene of devastation. The tyre marks were still there, held in reverence by those whose bitterness had tied them down and whose accommodation to a new political reality had bought them cheap. The press was active, it was said, papers fluttered through the cafés, fat fingers fiddled with a dozen rings. The girl was raddled with the need to kill: Teta and the needle — tell me, how do you deal with such memory? As the women moved among the tables in a morbid shoal, the light appeared to fail. I remembered Peta at the crossroads braking hard in a dangerous shift that quickly gained acceptance, admirers, a slow disintegration into decadence. The smart boys are dressed up, moving out, and what was once unique, a gesture, risk that stung with beauty, has now become a cheapened ritual.

How is it that such things pass from guesswork imitation into wonder — that much is easy — then to dance, animal dance beneath the trees? How is it that the café crowd applauds a riddle, when the key — Peta was beautiful, in a phrase — would turn their flattery to hate? How is it that pain will hunt so far, and such a victim?
THE POEM IN LOVE

It's possible that a poem in its own realm of being may take on a life of its own, and thus return by means of love some of the anguish and the suffering invested by the poet in its creation.

— Paul Ducasse
THE POEM IN LOVE: 1

There’s no end to this thing, it moves out, killing. Difficult to find, yet it lives on in plain daylight free of detectives avoiding the plastic explosives. Like the Gatling gun it clacks around in a windmill comedy of noise and portability (you never know when you might need to love it again, and thus you’ll have to carry it about, won’t you)

or, later, in the French café of its choice, quite independent of you (and yet you thought of it, didn’t you, or gave it life, or something similar free of plastic mint alcohol, in its own amusement to its own delight

---

2

Then it moves on, and you are heartstruck or stagebroken, but later you will ride out dressed in black, on a moon-blue palomino of your own choosing to match the scenery and find it hiding somewhere again! and you will laugh, possibly, and grip its hand and take it to the beach of its richest liking and if you will find driftwood and light the fire put on some coffee and the aromatics of its choice, perhaps it may promise never to leave you again! And you will laugh at this foolish ‘promise’! knowing (having made the creature) how it misbehaves understandably, having to avoid the trap of aromatics, burnt coffee, and a million tons of love.

'Free at last!' you will smile, self-deluded, knowing your tears ready to gush at the slightest memory of its beauty, and all the dumb remembrances dogging your darkness when you sleep alone and dream of catching it again and how you will hold hands et cetera in a foam bath of love! You sleep alone with staring eyes and a handful of mint leaves tousled in your hair (your freshly washed hair, beautiful!) and you are still hoping to stun it again, and have it all, all for yourself like a schoolgirl . . . you, fool, stagestruck clubfinger, still in love with its aroma, with its sweet dreams aroma bullshit nerve gas platitudes!

Sunstruck on Wilshire Boulevard nothing makes sense, autos starved of gas and people drivelling, and yet . . . yet you remember Coleridge, and several Revolutions! How do you explain it? With the tears running down like that? Your makeup blown and your cover shredded up? You know your right hand is empty, no gun, sun bathers bathing on the run, and you getting out!

Ah, you should be used to it. You make the thing you love, and give it ornaments, and tricking out the deck becomes the rage, and baubles make the being of the thing! You start again, new private eye greasing on the move, and all you look for is bruised light clouded in the mirror’s sheen.
5

Big deal you’re all alone again with freaky dreams
bumbling through the forest where you find yourself,
the dream fumbling with a club, but don’t think
the big freaky Dream becomes the Poem.
The club smashes down the pretty drinks
you and it loved so well.
So you and it and all the sticky failures
move out to that new territory
full of treachery and broken glass,
queer declensions, fields of icicles,
frost, snow, blue gloom and paradise
where you, it, she, he and them balloon
into the verbal network like a rubber sponge
(you and your tangled hair: beautiful!

6

the Poem finds a mutual revulsion
to discuss, and if talk founders on the trunk line
on the rocks of new leucotomy, as some believe,
by the Vilna, by the Don, after black nerve winter which you know will never end so long as you and it are arguing with club and claw
you hear the neural network breaking down transmitters fusing with the voltage overload —

you know it really loves you something dreadful endogenous depression’s not enough
the Doctor breaks in with a message from the Poem
now long vanished: ‘Meet me, princess, lover!
all smacked up on the highway
down by the river: bridge’ the new trap trick
The city is beautiful in the evening, seen from a height, with that traffic breaking rules along the line of light. Motorised developments emerge from the Poem that is the city into the Poem that breaks away from your dotted white mind, so you are caught in your emotions like a flock of red lights and the buses bustling to get through along the pipeline.

You are told to say ‘The city is beautiful in the evening,’ as though nightfall grew into a flock of lights to clothe the Poem that now walks in beauty like the diesel tram. You, collapsing back to trucks shunting in the yard of your wide emotion now reduced to metal poverty.

You are inside the ‘scream’. Yes, it’s very like an empty room with sky blue holes where the paintings have been removed for your protection. No clothing, it’s called ‘naked’ like the ‘scream’ in the empty room becoming the house expanding into a sky blue hole blowing up to the exact size of your imagination. Think of television with its cathode snow above the treeline going blue.

You will search for emaciated verbs to stuff up the cracks of your imagination for imagination read horror of the empty room where love is all you beg for and the Poem has gone to Acapulco for the Fire Season of the Acapulco Gold and other aphrodisiacs of its liking, of its best desire,
Yet this loneliness only means that the Poem has gone off to ponder its resources, so let it alone in the café where it can meander through the lists of great men and their works. For isn’t it you who feature so brightly in its wildest dreams? You don’t believe it? Yet it’s true, for it finds nothing else to render comfort in that realm where words tumble into space and get lost in a cold bigger than a plastic bomb exploding a silent violet blast in outer space or so you imagine, yet something remains of ‘kindness’ for your fortitude in giving nerve kicks to this poem who rushes out with other ‘friendly writers’ and gets totally lost on the fringe of the blast.

Exploring the blast area is like thousands of tiny microbes having arguments, so you prepare for the inevitable monster. To return to the movies is like eating cake, so easy and so forlorn that tears spring to mind. Is it cold beneath the Arafura Sea? Will television pop like smoke bombs across the paddy fields? And then in our armchair the girls will cuddle us together, so warm, so drastic, that only our manacles will be able to prevent us from harm and moral slop. This is what the Poem will hit us with: is it good enough to be prepared? Or will lunatics adopt the mask of eminent professors and slide us all down into the cloud chamber?
So the Poem flutters in the room without a cage, no message, reach for window, brush the mirror with its feathered wing. Too much? How much will the average line pretend, how much tension will the wire bear before the wire begins to sing, the tightrope breaks a knot? How much meaning will your page extend? When the line repeat defeat! defeat! And whose the feet that beat against the stair? Climbing to an attic with a view of ruin and a handy ledge. When did the wind ‘wither through the sedge’ like a madman running fingers through his hair? Force your hesitance. Make do. Face the sheet of glass. Despair.

Beneath the point of view there’s something like a hole, and if you wait around it will crawl all over your body. The hole is called ‘prose’ and never ends, as the point of view is named Verse’ and never ceases riddling. You could do better. Later the girls will lick you all over like a wet hole. Sooner than you think the ocean will become huge.

It is better if you leave. Beneath the film there’s a gaping laugh like a traffic accident, and all your fortunes will come true there. Wait for the lights to change and jump into the soup. The Poem is nowhere to be seen, so piss off. Later, in the bar full of maniacs, you will be given a prize.
The shoddiness of the work springs from the obvious haste with which it was assembled, you say, as a roebuck might spring from a bush if prodded, and the vast size which overwhelms the viewer as an elephant will blot out a footstool, and then crush it. But more must be said — apart from the speed which is charming, dizzy, and at the same time dubious, and the weight lowering over your shoulder like a cloud of dirty gas, there are similes, metaphors and gruesome images all tending to confuse like a martini’s ingredients all slopped together, stirred up and not shaken in the proper manner, for there is a great lack of proper manner in the whole shitty mess.

And more repulsive than this absence of decorum which may be just a trick like a talking dog or a brand new theory of poetics dragged unwillingly out of a hat and made to squeak, there is a sour taste and a whetted edge to the thirsty intellect, as though the Poem loathed its very medium and thus the world and the big blue sky which we know is good for breathing.

How can we endorse a monster? Christianity is dead but something else lives on, and it is our duty to believe it. How can we adore a dirty head? We do not masturbate. We respect the ‘truth’ of ‘art’ which is now having its pretty face rubbed in the shit of politics like a new theory of a talking pig.
The concept of the abandoned Poem reluctantly becomes plausible, and then very interesting. Like all bad art it is phoney. Goodbye! At night you could hear the language burning fiercely, and the heavy traffic moving about. Goodbye! Oh, how I loved you! Isn’t that what it said? And all this burnt to a crisp! And where is that Poem we loved so heedlessly and hoped for so much from? (Doesn’t that whip your tragic sentiment to foam?) I drank a Pepsi like they do in N.Y. and that fizzy noise was like how you could hear the Sonnet feasting on itself. Goodbye hopeless poems! Kiss me! Kiss me! Goodbye!
John Tranter was born in 1943 and was raised on an isolated farm on the south-east coast of Australia. He has travelled through Europe and Asia, and has worked mainly in printing, publishing and radio drama and features. He now lives in Sydney, and is married with one child. He has published two other books of poetry: Parallax (South Head Press, 1970) and Red Movie (Angus and Robertson, 1972). Another The Alphabet Murders (Angus and Robertson), is forthcoming.

In this series:

1 Stares and Statues Graham Rowlands
2 Public Relations Alan Wearne
3 The Powerhouse Richard Packer
4 The Long-Distance Poets' Entry into Heaven Peter Annand
5 The Alien Antigone Kefala
6 Orpheus with a Tuba Rae Desmond Jones
7 Love's Voyages Kris Hemensley
8 A Waltz on Stones John Griffin
9 Madam Blackboots Stefanie Bennett
10 St. Kilda Meets Hugo Ball Eric Beach
11 Living Alone Without a Dictionary Carol Novack
12 The Blast Area John Tranter
[ The back cover is blank ]